Abstract:

The present study aims to explore the experiences of self-concept among child labourers. It employs a phenomenological approach to understand and describe their perceptions of self-concept. The study was conducted among child labourers in Mashhad, Iran. The findings indicate that child labourers have a unique self-concept, which is shaped by their experiences of work and the challenges they face. The results highlight the importance of understanding and addressing the self-concept of child labourers in order to promote their well-being and integration into society. The study contributes to the existing knowledge on child labour and self-concept development.
